SATURDAY, DEC. 27, 1884.

Various plans are under discussion for harmonizing the Maryland Democracy, but they all include the condition that Senator Gorman's sulky ship shall be recognized.

The Boston papers are waging war on the horse railroads for blockading the streets. It is claimed that the railroad officials are sending more cars over one line than the law permits.

As little has been accomplished at this session of Congress there is now some talk of an extra session. The Democrats, however, will have no very busy with the Republicans to favor such a move.

Mr. Tilden proposes to come out of his retirement long enough to attend the Inauguration ceremonies, and the fact that he latently to linger along the Indian some two weeks does not altogether please the Southern Cold-set makers.

The Democrats have five candidates in the field already for the nomination to the governorship of New York next year. They are Lieutenant-Governor Hill, Comptroller Chapin, Congressman Sheehan, Ex-Senator Cornell and Roswell P. Flower.

It is stated, on the authority of a Massachusetts friend of General Benjamin F. Butler, that that gentleman has signed a contract with a New York publishing firm to write for them his political reminiscences. The work is to be in two volumes and the price Butler is to receive $20,000 and a royalty.

The Springfield Republican having said that Representative Hewitt is "a little too curious and personal in his reforms," the Tyler Courier adds that he is so narrow in his ability to form the desired to take the duties off of scrap iron, which would greatly benefit his business to the great detriment of others.

The fact that there is no Republican opposition to the reelection of Senator Logan is very gratifying to the party at large. Hon. C. B. Farwell, whose name has been quite prominently mentioned in connection with the senatorship, has written a letter saying that if he had a vote in the Legislature it would be cast for Gen. Logan.

It now seems probable that Senators Bayard and Garland will enter the Cabinet and the names of Senators Hoar and Pendleton are also mentioned in connection with Cabinet positions. If these gentlemen are appointed from Democratic Senatorial vacancies will be created and the Senate Judiciary Committee will have to be reorganized as the Senators from Delaware and Arkansas are both members.

A Washington dispatch says, "Senator Hoar said that he thought it was more than probable that the proposed new Hawaiian treaty would be withdrawn from the Senate soon by the State Department and another treaty negotiated upon. He said even the Hawaiian Government now admitted that this country did not receive as good terms as it deserved. Better terms would be given in the next treaty. He said further, however, that all the treaties would fail to be ratified by the Senate.

Representative Kellogg of Louisiana, speaking of his expected contest in the next House, says: "Of course I do not intend to get my seat in the next Congress, but I am determined to show up the manner of doing things down in Louisiana. I will be able to show that I was elected by an overwhelming majority and counted out by fraud, ballot-box stuffing, etc. I do not expect to get the hands of a partisan Congress, in fact, Jace Bailey was not elected I do not care about a seat in the House. A Republican member from the South during the Cleveland administration will be a mere knot on a stick."

The fact that an English factory in manufacture has changed its location from the land of free trade to Rhode Island, in order to get the benefit of our system of protection and the which our Industrial Labor Planning class have flourished, is not a strong political in favor of the Democratic theory. The manufacturer gives his reason that free trade has undone English manufacturers, and brought poverty upon the people. There are thousands and hundreds of thousands of people out of work. Never has the business of the country been so depressed as it is now." He will pay his employes thirty per cent. higher wages than he did in England.

Chief Justice Waite is in such feeble health in the opinion of his physicians and family, as to prohibit his presence on the bench for some time to come. There is no doubt whatever that the Chief Justice himself has determined to withdraw from all official labor until after the 4th of March. He will go to Southern California, where the climate is expected to measurably restore his shattered health, consequent upon an attack of erysipelas, after recovering from which he has been the victim of prolonged nervous prostration. Justice Miller is senior other justice, is now the acting chief justice, and will so continue throughout the period of Chief Justice Waite's convalescence.

The tariff for revenue only, or free trade Democrats are in a tight place. They say that the one thing necessary to remove the present business depression in this country is to strike down the protective system, but unfortunately for this theory, in England, where the free trade policy that the Democrats would introduce into this country is in full force, the depression is much greater than it is here, and there is a strong move out to overcome the evil by modifying their present laws. The St. James Gazette says: "The resolution passed on Wednesday at the meeting of the Associated Chambers of Agriculture is only one sign out of many that the whole question of free trade and protection has already been opened, one sign of many that, if the present depression continues much longer, the new constituencies will be more agitated by Cobdenism than ever, "one-sided free trade" than by any other subject whatever. And we are persuaded that the artisans are not to be relied upon at all for opposing the agitation. Tens of thousands of them are already asking whether they are better off with bread at fivepence a loaf and four days work a week than they would be with bread at sixpence a loaf and six days work a week. No doubt the Cobden Club can give them an answer satisfactory to themselves, but whether it will prove convincing to the sovereign people is quite another matter."

CAUGHT A TARTER.

A REPUBLICAN TELLS A DEMOCRATS WHY THEY SHOULD BE HAPPY.

(Chicago Tribune.)

DETROIT, Ill., Dec. 6. The Hon. J. H. Funk, one of the Republican State campaign speakers, known as the "Farmer orator," while seeing some Democratic friends, was called upon to address the multitude which he did thusly:

"I do not blame you for feeling happy. It is the first time the party has had an opportunity to rejoice since the bulk of the Democratic party surrendered at Appomattox. Before that event there had been several occasions for rejoicing on the part of the Democracy. When the Republicans were driven back from the field of Bull Run by Democratic squadrons a mighty burst of joy from Democratic throats throughout the land. Later when Burnside undertook to avenge the defeats of Fredericksburg and was driven back with fearful slaughter, the Democrats had another jubilee.

"Further on, when the gallant Hooker was forced by the party of reform to retire from the field of Chancellorsville this opening the way for the Democrats to capture Pennsylvania, your hearts knew no bounds. Of course such double ways of joy as these successive jubilees always involve provided could not be spontaneous through ordinary channels, but were compelled to torture and starving helpless prisoners in Andersonville and Libby prisons, in burning colored orphan asylums, in sending infected clothing into northern cities in order that Christmas might add its twin scourge, Democracy, in overthrowing the institutions of this country.

"It is true that Democratic hopes at Vicksburg, Gettysburg, Atlanta, and elsewhere subsequently blighted, but you had to be able to observe Adam Denues smile countenances, and hubbers in consequence of their elegant visages, were compelled to double the price of shaving to such Democrats as indulged in that luxury. But it is past, and gone in history, perhaps on the Democratic brains. Truly you have occasion to rejoice and be exceedingly glad. When you went out to power, gum-vera cabin was in the land. Election of the—then and now—solidly Democratic States were in open and avowed rebellion. You now begin jubilant and peaceful and prosperous Nation.

"The day of the Draft month was then the month of October, and the rebellion was over, and the Southern lands were open to Liberty, and weeping chattels hailed at the waving of a magic wand, become free men. When you went out to vote you left but 15 cents in the treasury on returning you find it full to repletion, and I have no doubt but the prospect for a full meal has much to do with the present happiness of your party. The man who that appeared to the ancient King in the Greens are again in the precinct and it rose and foretold the famine.

"I am asked if I object to your joy and to my answer I say not at all. Are you in earnest, or do you in fact believe that a few pretended Republicans of New York have betrayed their party for the Republican party? all are equally in principle? No, my friends, the Sphinx speaks to lead the Christian to the Sepulchre and there ask him to abjure his faith, take the follower of Mohammed to Mecca and ask him to renounce the Prophet, take the mother whose only son was murdered by Democratic hands to kneel at the grave and there thank God for Democratic success? But don't think me so bigoted as to say that Republicans have been a potent factor in overthrowing the freedom of the ballot, that they have been protected by it, and that a "moral leper" has been elevated to the highest office in the nation.

"And, friends, when the 4th of Grover Cleveland but his decks of darkness shall have passed by, forgotten forever, and when the mounds built over his victims shall have sunken down, then say up thus on the monument of Fame, inscribed in letters of living light, among those of the wise, the noble, the true and the good, will the name of James G. Blaine be read and revered by the millions of generations yet unborn."

McLean Enraged.

An Albany dispatch says: It seems that John R. McLean, editor of the Cincinnati Enquirer, did not have an agreeable quarter of an hour when he called upon President-elect Cleveland last Sunday. There were certain incidents of the late political campaign that would lead people to suspect that the polite pig would not be killed for long by Mr. Cleveland, but Mr. McLean apparently had no misgivings concerning his visit. He knew that he had cast a majority of the votes of the Ohio delegation for Cleveland at the National Democratic Convention. This action had removed practically from the list of Presidential candidates one of Mr. Cleveland's rivals, Allen G. Thurman. Yet there were rivals in Albany who could have told Mr. McLean that there was something in the campaign which so annoyed Mr. Cleveland as to "call" on the Cincinnati Enquirer assailing him. That they should appear in the leading Democratic newspaper of Ohio was of course an additional aggravation. Mr. Cleveland's friends clearly proved to Mr. McLean the publication of the articles, Mr. McLean saying that he had 20,000 Republican leaders for whom they were intended. Then came the Chevalier scandal. The particulars of it were given by the Enquirer. Mr. Cleveland was astounded. He could not speak of the Enquirer afterward except in terms of wrath. His friends say that he is a man of a forgiving nature, but that in this case he feels that he cannot condone the offence.

Mr. McLean is said to have been received with politeness by the Governor, and to have been treated with cheerfulness until he proffered some advice concerning the Cabinet. Then the Governor is reported to have said bluntly that this lady was not desired and to have expressed frankly his opinion of Mr. McLean's conduct during the campaign. Mr. Cleveland is said to have said to manage, but decidedly in his talk. This interview has not since appeared in the Enquirer. Shortly after its publication Mr. McLean embarked from the Executive Mansion in a highly excited condition. While he is reported to have said to New York friends that he talk plainly to them that he considered himself on the "swearing" tack.

The Maine correspondent of the Boston Journal writes as follows concerning the Maine Central Railroad: During the past seven years, while the Maine Central Railroad has been under the continuous management of Mr. Jackson as President and Mr. Tucker as Superintendent, and later as Vice President and General Manager, the business of the road has shown a wonderful increase. During this period the number of miles operated has grown from 350 to 525 by the purchase of the European and North American railway from Bangor to Vanceboro, the Eastern from Maine from Bangor to Bucksport and the Shore Line from Bangor to Bar Harbor. The annual earnings of the road have increased from $1,434,688 in 1878 to $2,816,372, or the gross earnings per mile from $4,090 to $5364. The net earnings per mile have also increased from $1697 to $2250. In 1878 there was a deficit after paying interest and rentals of $37,209, but in 1884 there was a surplus of $225,085, out of which dividends of 4 per cent. were paid. The market value of the stock has also increased from $18 a share in 1878 to $35 in 1884, and the per cent. consols from 688 and 800 in 1879 to 8121 and 8123 in 1884. Mr. Jackson has given his undivided attention to the management of the road, and has been personally very popular among its patrons. Mr. Sewall, his successor, has also had a good deal of railroad experience, and will without doubt be a popular President of the corporation. Owing to his other large business interests he will probably allow Mr. Tucker more latitude in the management of the road than heretofore, and considering the popularity and great business capacity of the latter it is safe to say that the present prosperity of the road will be maintained and probably increased, as the business shall warrant it.

New York Graphic: Mr. Blaine does well to drop his libel suit against the Indianapolis Sentinel. The attempt to blacken his character and that of his wife was condemned by every good man regardless of party lines, and he has been sufficiently vindicated.

Miss Madison's Match.

Madge Madison was good-looking. She was neither too tall nor too short, too plump nor too skinny. She had a clear complexion, regular features, and a pair of wonderfully attractive liquid gray eyes. She had also an undeniable knack of so painting her sometimes shabby clothes, that the beholder did not remark their shabbiness in the distinction of the wearer. Not that the wearer liked shabby clothes—she loathed them with a fervor few people credited her with, but she was essentially self-contained person, and endured the minor ills of life with goodful fortitude. The Madises had never had any money to speak of, and just now things had come to a crisis with them.

"What on earth's to be done with all you girls?" Colonel Madison had asked this very helplessly of his four mothers-in-law daughters, that morning at breakfast.

It was the Christmas holidays, and the three younger ones Edith, of course, turned up with the Christmas bills, equally important and inopportune to their hapless fortunate father. Three more months to be filled, three that tall, growing girls to be clothed in something, and the school bills falling due monthly all the time. No wonder the wretched Colonel groaned over his quarter-full!

"We must marry," said Lillian, the beauty of the family.

"We must work," said Ethel, who took life seriously, and had "views."

"Thank goodness I'm too young for anything but to be expected of me," said Barbara, the baby, pathetically.

"Has anything particular happened?" inquired Madge.

"The bank has gone, and with it all I had, every copy pension," said the unfortunate Colonel, sighing deeply. "When I die you will all of you be papered so it will be better for you to set about doing something for yourselves before that sad day comes. For your sakes, my child ren, I shall take every be ginable care of myself, but all of us the lot of us be but mortal."

That sighing thought was too much for the unincumbered parent. He lapsed into melancholy to be ready for the reminders of the meal.

At the conclusion of Madge, who had been thinking matters over, said:

"Father, you are right about our doing something for ourselves. I can't be a governess, I don't know enough, but old Lady Dumbledon wants a companion-keeper. I think her too cross for me. I shall be earning £10 a year, and at the same time be relieving one of many incumbrances."

"You're a good girl, Madge. I'm sorry to see her you, I'm sure, but I don't see any help for it."

Miss Madison was a girl of action. She speedily had all the preliminaries settled with Lady Dumbledon, whose service she was to enter toward the end of January. But before taking up her new duties, she permitted herself the relaxation of a visit to a school friend, now well married and living in Kensington.

She returned from this outing somewhat serious, and, in reply to the affectionate badinage of her sisters, declared to be elected that she had met a man at her friend's house, whom, in more fortunate circumstances, she could have cared a good deal for. Unfortunate, as she owned to the suspected, the favorable impression had been mutual, there could be no results from it.

The two fond ones had come to an end; she had her delightful fellow-guest had separated. Each since days of chance acquaintance, felt in all human probability never to meet again. Such is life, and—back!

She had, however, mistaken the power of her own attractions. On the eve of starting for Lady Dumbledon's, she received a short letter from the man whose good fortune it had been to so strongly recommend himself to her.

He had been "irresistibly drawn" to her, he said, in the days that they had been thrown together, but he had then been too poor a man to be the advocate of his heart and affections. He had let her go in silence, and had suffered much in so doing. Now, things were changed with him. He had most unexpectedly come into a property of £10,000 a year by the sudden death of a cousin, and felt he was not other himself and his newly acquired fortune, for her acceptance. Circumstances connected with his accession to fortune, necessitated his immediately starting for Australia and would keep him out of England for a year. Would she forgive his precipitate wooing, out of charity for the violence of his passion for her, and promise to become his wife as soon as he returned to his home?

This, decorated of many passionate expressions of regard for her, was the substance of the letter.

Miss Madison handed it directly to her father.

"What shall you do, child?" he asked, anxiously.

"I want your advice, but I am inclined to accept Mr. Smith-White's offer," she replied, dashing down her eyes, and adding a little sigh.

"You were always a most sensible girl, Madge, and to be trusted about your own affairs. Accept him by all means, if you feel you can."

"Down put your knees, and thank Heaven, fasting for a rich man's love," quoted Lillian, the beauty, on the matter being explained to her, in the absolute need of the usually self-ridiculed sister for a confidante.

Thus encouraged by her family, Miss Madison accepted her fate. In return for her compliance she received a rapturous (registered) letter of thanks, including a magnificent diamond betrothal ring. Mr. Smith-White passionately explored his hand back. In being obliged to embark without snatching one fond farewell with his betrothed, for his ship was to sail that night, and he had no time to come down to Norwood.

Miss Madison's chief cares having darkened on this startling change, the position of her sister companion, even to a lady of title, appeared in appropriate to her.

The Dowager Lady Dumbledon, being apprised of recent events, graciously released her from her engagement, and furthermore, invited her to spend a few days on a friendly visit. Being a kindred lady, with round cheeks and twinkling eyes, she even gave the bride-elect many pretty little presents, and, out of sheer benevolence towards a girl about to do so well for herself. It was Miss Madge's first realization of the good truth that to those who have, for me, going to have, much shall be given.

The months flew by. Each mail brought long, loving letters from the enamored Smith White, who counted the days when his hateful business should be accomplished, and he should be at last able to return and claim his bride. He began to give delicate and practical hints about the trousseau necessary to be got together, which he wished should befit the position which the dearest Madge would occupy as his honored and cherished wife. Let no scruples she begged, on the score of economy, restrain her in her preparations. The paying of the bills could be a matter for future consideration between Colonel Madison and himself. He particularly desired that his wife should come to him land-amply equipped for the round of country-house visits he meant to take her immediately after the first few weeks of the honeymoon were over.

Miss Madison, upon this, went to the best people, and are long had ordered a trousseau of models and recherche magnificence. The letters of her lover became more ardent. He begged that the marriage might take place at Exeter, when he calculated he would have just reached England. Let no false delicacy, he implored his dearest Madge, prevent her from acceding to his wishes.

Miss Madison had no false delicacy, and the point was conceded. Expectation in the bosom of the whole circle at Norwood, rose high; for Mr. Smith-White was on his way home via India, whither his miserable affairs had dragged him.

In a few weeks a letter came announcing that he had reached Paris, where he was just stopping in passant to buy a few pretty trifles for his bride. Then came a break of three days in the correspondence, followed by a letter from an English friend of Mr. Smith-White's, who had met him at his hotel, telling of his sudden illness, brought on by over-travelling and over-excitement. After this came a short telegram announcing his death.

Terrible, terrible downfall of high hopes! Was ever any girl so much to be pitied? Madge Madison turned white, to her very lip, with the shock of the news. She walked blindly out of the room, up the shabby stairs, dark looking, herself alone, in her bedroom, sat down to face the awful collapse of her bright expectations.

The next day brought some amelioration of the situation to Colonel Madison, though his daughter could hardly be expected as yet to take comfort in it. The same friend wrote to say that his unfortunate fellow-countryman's business, had been to sign a hurriedly-prepared will, leaving everything he possessed to his betrothed wife. He had expressed a wish that the whole Madison family should travel to the place with proper mourning, and be present at his funeral, which was to take place at Kensal Green, the following Thursday. The writer stated that he was making all necessary arrangements, and he should start for London with the remains that night.

The widowed bride-elect was prostrated by her misfortune in feeling that carefully the best and most generous of men. Her plaintive sisters placed her mourning, and fitted on, from the same celebrated artiste who had executed the wedding order.

The fabrics were of the richest, severe and elegant simplicity in woollen expensive, but what of that? Was this time to haggle over the price of mourning garments to do honor to the memory of a man who had benefacted?

Thursday morning saw the whole family arrayed in the sable weeds ready to set out on their mournful journey. A coach from the nearest job master's, the lady being in decent black, so as to be in harmony with the melancholy occasion, pulled up at the door.

The four black-robed young figures with Col. Madison, took their places in the carriage, the eyes bright with excitement, for even a funeral was something to a country lady hard but few diversions. They arrived punctual to the minute at the cemetery, and waited for the funeral hearse to appear. Time wore on, but it did not come. One hour, two hours, passed in anxious expectation, and still the funeral dragged strangely on the road. Colonel Madison interviewed the official. The college of Mr. Smith-White's intended betrothed had been given. Other grounds of sympathy rabbed tears came weeping, for poor dead, and went away, and still the funeral and his daughters lingered, unwilling to be accused heretofore of any lack of respect.

A cold, cutting, northeast wind blowing mockingly amongst the hard-faced mourning to derision and insult the mourners with its bitter cheerlessness. At length it became apparent to everyone that some fearful mistake had been made, and the useless sacrifice of further waiting was obvious. Col. Madison slowly with the little convoy from the head, and the crushing the wind, the dolorous news of the deceased, and every mortifying sense of displeasure.

He went that evening to Kensington, to see the lady to whom he hoped his daughter had first met her betrothed, but only to find to his disgust that the house was to let, and that no trace of Mrs. Bigsby was to be found.

Nothing, therefore, was to be ascertained from that quarter. He was anxious to know where else to apply for information, and so waited patiently with the hope that the post would bring him some information.

But no such explanation came. Puzzled and furious, the colonel telegraphed to the hotel in Paris for particulars of Mr. Smith-White's death, and the subsequent disposal of his remains. An answer came to the effect that no such person had ever been there, nor any one answering to the description had visited the hotel, and the proprietor had actually denied that any one had died there suddenly under his roof. It then began to dawn upon the unfortunate family that they had been made the victims of an infamous conspiracy.

The Dowager Lady Dumbledon, kind-whilst for the poor girl, thus prematurely made a fool of, carried her off to Brighton, charitably trusting that a change of scene might assuage the anxiety of those agonies of shame and mortification that the deceived and deserted young creature must be experiencing.

The little circle wherein the Madisons moved at Dull then being was drawn to gas, foundation with fallen that all the heartless cruelty of which poor Madge had been made the victim.

The sale of her effects leased out in Brighton, and awoke a perfect frenzy of sympathy. Her lady friends pronounced as poor Madge—she was so quiet, so dignified, so patient of under her misfortune—I still sympathy.

Lady Dumbledon became so fond of her young friend, who was unfeigned by the success of the funeral, and received the greatest possible attention.

After a few weeks, it was semi-officially given out that Sir Reginald Daventry, a young man of family and fortune and irreproachable character, had successfully sought Miss Madison's hand, though so short a engagement was to be entirely due to the present, so that the poor girl might have time to recover her shattered feelings.

Mademoiselle Colonel Madison was evolving a great deal of sympathy, too. He became a feature at all clubs, and could actually have contained well have dispensed with as the father of the young lady who had met with so extraordinary an illness and an accident. Everyone offered him advice in the matter.

"Hang it, colonel," the club gaunt, "ought to be flogged and made to go to Australia," cried one of his old friends, upon hearing "Spot a detective on his track, man."

The colonel considered his friend's advice, and, if after considerable deliberation, concluded to act on it. He therefore went to Scotland Yard, and on the strength of an experienced officer, he decided to take the gorgeous detective of the jewelers whose name was in the paper, in order, if possible, to assert in something about the purchaser. Here a shock awaited him. The thing had been undertaken by a lady, with instructions that it should be placed in the Madison's account.

"Good heavens, Decker," he stammered, "you direct to pay a lady like that to my account without my authority or sanction? Could not you see it? It was a fabulous, a—guileful fraud?"

Mr. Roderick stood high in his calling. He was sorry, for the colonel, and so at once took back the ring, expressing his regret that he should have fallen into the error complained of; but as soon as Colonel Madison had left his shop, he went down to Scotland Yard, and, there made a certain communication which he had received from a quarter, of his illustrated customer. A few days after this Sir Reginald Daventry's younger brother ran down from London and walked from his to one.

"Look here, Reggy, You seem to be going to marry Miss Madison, I'm sorry, sloppy. Well, I'm my advice and don't."

"Sir Reginald's beautiful face paled. "Why do you, my dear?" he asked, in a passion.

"Because that she is too clever for such stupid fellows like you and me. That Isaac was all a great, got up by herself from beginning to end. The man never existed. He was a myth. She took in her own people, she took in old Dumbledon, and she all but took in Scotland Yard, three whose hands were old Madison at last put the affair. The only person fortunate for you that she did not take in was old Roder.—London Scraps.

KING'S EVIL

Was the name formerly given to Scrofula because of its supposed ability to cure by a King's touch. The world is wiser now, and knows that can only be cured by a thorough purification of the blood. If this is neglected, the disease perpetuates its kind through generation after generation. Among its earlier symptoms are Eczema, Cutaneous Eruptions, Tumors, Boils, Carbuncles, Erysipelas, Purulent Ulcers, Nervous and Physical Collapse, etc. If allowed to continue, Rheumatism, Scrofulous Catarrh, Kidney and Liver Diseases, Tubercular Consumption, and various other dangerous or fatal maladies, are produced by it.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

is the only powerful and always reliable blood purifier on the market. It is so clearly and decisively Hereditary Scrofula, and the slighter forms of cutaneous diseases and malady. At the same time, it effectually eradicates the disease, to obtain full action, by the vital energy and regenerating the entire system. Therefore

Regenerative Medicine

Is composed of the genuine Hoffman's Sarsaparilla, with Yellow Dock, Sillingia, the Iodides of Potassium and Iron, and other ingredients of great potency, carefully and scientific. Be sure your Jedi. Its formula is given in full to the medical profession, and is the best physician's constant. Prescribe AYER'S SARSAPARILLA in it.

Absolute Cure

For all diseases caused by the vitiation of the blood. It is concentrated to the highest practicable degree, far beyond any other preparation for which like effects are claimed, and is therefore the cheapest, as well as the best blood purifying medicine in the world.
